

Heritage Protection & the Common Good

Does heritage protection align with the common good? Are the aesthetic or historical values of buildings private or public matters? Who has the right to the White City? How do the citizens of the city perceive their connection and responsibility to historic buildings and to the urban environment? What are the relations between the various stakeholders? Is the nomination of the White City as a World Heritage Site a blessing or a burden?

Liebling Haus invites local and international creatives from various disciplines to apply for our residency program centered on the topic of heritage protection and the common good – between public and private interests. The program serves as a platform for artistic investigation and action, and active critical commentary on processes the city is undergoing. We seek to broaden the view and to examine the tensions and challenges that exist on site, fourteen years after the initiation of Tel Aviv's Heritage Preservation Plan, published after the UNESCO declaration of the White City.

The project collaborates with research at the Technion- Israel Institute of Technology, studying the conflicts and challenges associated with world heritage protection. This comparative analysis centers on two case studies: Tel Aviv and Vienna.
